LabVIEW 2019 w/ LabVIEW 2019 Main Gatekeeper If you are running a 64-bit Linux system and have a version of LabVIEW 2019 required for your system's operating system (this applies for all versions of LabVIEW up to 2019 R2), it is possible to create a version of LabVIEW 2019 that does not require the installation of the main Gatekeeper. LabVIEW 2019 Main Gatekeeper is a required feature for the Linux platform. It provides various benefits, such as pre-configuring the dlls

Since you can't deactivate a license (at least not without an upgrade), why does it not start in trial mode instead of a single-user trial mode? I could understand it not letting you remove the user from the list or not letting you remove the license if it would have a certain period where it would give the user a pop-up warning asking for a license file (which is possible, since the license dialog has its own license file) and then say "You've been logged in for X minutes and can't be deleted from the list", where X is some period of time after which your license becomes default, but there is no way to revoke that and start it in Trial mode. Anyways, the point is that this is a very bad mistake. The user has been logged in for more than X minutes and wasn't told about it. This should not be the case. A: The behavior you describe is about as standard as it gets. If you have an application that you want to use for a specific environment, you may purchase or download it and then run it. By running the application you implicitly agree with the license terms, as long as you are not using it for anything that is not covered by that license. This is exactly what LabVIEW does as well, so the concept is not specific to LabVIEW. In other words, by using the application you agree to the license agreement, and if you don't agree to the license agreement, you should not use it. The trial mode would not be appropriate if the license agreement was tied to a product, since that is just like any other application where you pay once and can't use the application for the default X minutes (which really amounts to the same thing). But if you have a license agreement that is not tied to a specific product, but is general to the operating system, then you probably do not want to use the default trial mode since it will only be valid if you are using the product for a specific purpose, and you may have used the product for that purpose already by some time when the trial was accepted. Also, there is no way to set such license agreements. So I would guess that there is no way to set this particular license agreement for trial mode. If this is really an issue, I would consider contacting the developer of the application and asking about this. Edit: I have to say that I find it somewhat odd that the products you describe all have a "1cb139a0ed
