However, the OTA and the board seem to be in agreement that the cost of switching to a proven product like the Apple TV would be too great for Apple. No. The OTA is digital. What it streams is standard def encoded. The following comment on the Apple TV thread in the Apple Developer Forums has a lot of detail: You've asked for a cable replacement solution and I've offered to provide it. You then ask for the alternative you were going to get to cable. I've offered to give you the Apple TV and you've balked at the cost of it. We just talked about switching to a non-ATV solution and I've offered to sell you one. I think you just don't like the idea of the cable being off the air. You don't like that it doesn't just turn on and plug into the tv. You don't like the fact that it has to be plugged in to a power source. I'm willing to discuss these things with you. I'm very aware of how much you think of and love the cable. I think you just don't like the idea of the cable being off the air. True, but that also seems like a low priority. I'm more concerned about my laptop being off the air while I'm at work, and that doesn't seem like a big problem to me. Some folks don't like the cable but would gladly have the Apple TV as a replacement. I'd rather have a less expensive product and have it work with my existing network than be stuck with a proprietary solution, but I don't want to pay for that.
